Finding primary source material for Twentieth Century British History NEA topics

Introduction

This guide is for students interested in researching the histories of equality and diversity in Britain in the second half of the twentieth century. The sources include films and broadcasts, interviews and art, laws and polls and books and periodicals and have been classified by theme.

Almost all of the listed sources are freely available online. The sole exceptions are newspaper archives which are available in many non-academic libraries and/or to individual subscribers for a small fee.

About the author

Marcus Collins is Reader in Contemporary History at Loughborough University. He is author of The Beatles and Sixties Britain (2020) and Modern Love (2003), co-author of Why Study History? (2020) and editor of The Permissive Society and Its Enemies (2007). He is currently writing the second volume of his study of the Beatles (The Beatles' World) and Arrested Development: Broadcasting and Homosexuality from Wolfenden to AIDS, and is researching British public opinion towards decolonisation and a comparative study of social attitudes in the 'global sixties'.

This resource forms part of a wider project to reimagine the teaching of Britain's recent past. Dr Collins welcomes opportunities to exchange ideas with teachers or students who are similarly interested in contemporary Britain and its histories of gender, ethnicity, sexuality, social change, national identity and popular culture. He can be contacted at marcus.collins@lboro.ac.uk.
